Hurricanes are generated in the Atlantic Ocean. They are intense tropical depressions that hit the East Coast from summer into autumn. The hurricane is, so to speak, an American typhoon. The areas that are most frequently hit are known as Hurricane Alley. It consists of the coastal regions from Florida to North Carolina on the Atlantic coast, and from Texas to Florida in the Gulf of Mexico.

The most violent hurricane ever recorded was the one that hit Galveston, Texas, at the end of August and into September in 1900: more than 6,000 people were killed. At the end of August in 2005, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida were hit by Hurricane Katrina. More recently, the powerful Hurricane Sandy in October, 2012, impacted 24 states and did over $70 billion of damage, even flooding the subways in New York City.

Incidentally, in the past hurricanes were given women's names, a practice that derived from the stereotyped idea that women easily become emotional and hysterical. These days, men's names are also used to avoid gender discrimination. Thus, even the naming of hurricanes has been influenced by social change.
